

Metropolitan Police

The Metropolitan Police Service (MPS) is tasked with the provision of law enforcement to the people of London in England. Currently made up of approximately 30,000 police officers, 13,000 police staff and over 2,600 Police Community Support Officers (PCSO's) it is one of the largest police forces in the world.

The Metropolitan Police has a well earned reputation for quality of policing. From the time of their inception in 1829 under Robert Peel, the Met (as it is fondly known) has been tasked to respond to situations which are planned and unplanned.

Much of the equipment which the MPS employs is highly classified and divulging the nature of some of it would be a threat to national security in the UK. Therefore we cannot detail all of the work we have undertaken on their behalf. Suffice to say it spans our current offering of IT hardware expertise, as well as bespoke software solutions development, an offshoot of the work which we do at Zanshuri.

The MPS has often reached out to certain non-standard organisations in an effort to procure the very best equipment for their staff and the safekeeping of the citizens of London.

Zanshuri underwent an intensive security assessment and various quality control regimes before our input was fully approved. It is a testament to the sincerity of the requirement for quality that Zanshuri was able to displace many larger entities which had been considered the inevitable choice for this particular requirement.

The MPS uses a number of data collections suites such as CRIS, CRIMINT and various national registers, all of which feed into the Police National Computer (PNC). The use of these systems is public knowledge. Zanshuri has worked with the MPS to enhance these data collection systems and to improve working conditions for both staff and officers.

Our relationship with the MPS is a fruitful one. It has forced us to push the boundaries of our R&D remit and contributed directly to the incredible reputation for outstanding engineering which Zanshuri has gained over the years. In turn Zanshuri enjoys the satisfaction of knowing that our knowledge and cutting edge technology is being put to use making London and in turn the world, a safer place.

Zanshuri Systems.

Always better.